Van Dyke first introduced his idea for Titanic 2 in 2007, but it did not gain serious attention until 2009 when he discussed it in a radio interview with Podi. His plan was to bring an aging rock star back to reprise his role as Jack Dawson, to re-enact the events of the original film using modern technology. This film took place in 1985. In 1985, Morgan Freeman was in his early forties. Development and casting [edit] In 2007, Van Dyke posted the script to his website. Two years later he contacted the filmmakers behind the popular Titanic documentary Love, Titanic!, saying that his idea for the film had been stolen. In a radio interview with Radio North Coast, Van Dyke claimed that 20th Century Fox, the film studio behind the original Titanic film, wanted to create the sequel and told him to write a script in five days. Van Dyke said that he instead spent three years writing a new script, under the title Titanic 2, and that Fox would only distribute it if it was called Titanic 2. He also said that the film studio told him to include all of the set-pieces and major set pieces from the original film, although he would try to make them more realistic, and that the film studio intended to put much of the film in 3D, to sell more movie tickets. In September 2009, Van Dyke told the BBC that the film would follow the events in 1985, since Titanic was originally released in 1912, and that he intended to use modern technology to bring the film to life. He also said that he would be in his mid-thirties. In early 2010, Van Dyke began auditioning actors for the lead roles. After auditioning more than 20 actors, he found the perfect fit for Jack and Rose in American Idol season 9 runner-up Clay Aiken, whom he had been working with since 2007. At the time of casting, Aiken was 38 years old, 5'11", and 170 pounds. He was placed on heavy exercise and diet programs. Aiken was also forced to cut a lot of his hair so that he would look older. During filming in April, he discovered that he had lost about 30 pounds due to a fast and the effect it had on his system. He also was informed that the ship he would be boarding would be real. Aiken said that he had never acted before and had to be persuaded by his agent to audition for Titanic 2. He had also
