After closing the application, you can select this keyboard layout from the Logos menu in the Tool Bar. the neuromuscular junction (NMJ) is a highly specialized synapse in which ACh receptors (AChRs) play a key role in regulating the strength of synaptic transmission. These receptors are built by the aggregation of components from the pre and postsynaptic side of the synapse. As mentioned above, a key component in the development of NMJ is the AChR. As AChRs start to coalesce, they are a key target for innervation, but as a result of the postsynaptic specialization, innervation comes in from different directions and preferentially adds on to the surface of the muscle fiber. Thus, removal of the postsynaptic specialization leads to growth of nerve endings into the muscle fiber, which results in degeneration of the muscle fiber. An example of this abnormal growth pattern at the NMJ is observed in Alzheimer's disease (AD) \[[B28]\]. This results in a loss of cholinergic innervation to the cortex and the hippocampus, but the level of innervation is not significantly reduced at the synapses at the NMJ in the brain stem and other regions of the central nervous system. As a result, different types of symptoms emerge in different regions of the nervous system. In the brain, there are cholinergic synapses not only at the NMJ, but also in the neocortex (where cholinergic a69d392a70
