The Download Folder would be a folder that's created by the program in order to temporarily store data. Data would include any files, folders and other files you might wish to save after the process is over. So, while you can copy discs at the same time, the files you'd copy might also be removed after the process has been finished so you have to make sure not to save them on that folder. The Burn Folder is the destination where the copied discs will be burnt to in the end. A: There are two programs I use: XdvDuc It's a command line app that just copies the DVD to your computer, you need to have Xming (a graphical Windows manager, which can be installed from the X.org project page) running on your computer for it to work (or download the GTK+ version of Xming). It's free software. K9Copy It's the other side of the same coin. It's a GUI app, it makes it easy to just drag and drop the DVD onto the program window and have it work. As mentioned in the comments, when it comes to copying your own DVD movies, I'd also suggest k9copy as it's free, also has a live preview window, and will download missing parts and then play them from the computer. You will need to provide the detailed request for move in price
