L1-L2 cochlear implantation in a patient with a unilateral congenital aural atresia. A patient with congenital aural atresia and conductive hearing loss received a unilateral CII and L1-L2 cochlear implants. After surgery, she had good speech perception performance, and could discriminate between English vowels. We suggest that the bilateral stimulation and the lack of a vestibular nerve may have improved her speech perception. Speech discrimination was possible with a CI only when there was a low noise floor in the environment. We conclude that bilateral stimulation with CII or CII-L1-L2 implants may be beneficial in patients with congenital aural atresia, provided that high-quality programming can be performed with a normal middle ear.Q: Xpath expression for extracting node text in XML using python I am trying to parse an XML which is some text this is a test here is more text some text this is another test this is even more text The problem is that there is a pattern I want to find where the text is not directly after b or c but after the node itself, and the text itself is in the middle of the text and not at the end.
