The distribution of endogenous retrovirus (ERV) sequences and messenger RNA was studied in various mouse tissues by means of the polymerase chain reaction (PCR) and a blotting technique, respectively. PCR analyses revealed that ERV sequences were present in mouse tissues at different levels. DNA extracted from non-permissive cells was amplified with retrovirus-specific primer sets in the presence of deoxyribonucleoside triphosphates and dUTPase, and probed with a molecularly cloned ERV-derived probe or a probe derived from a gag region of the endogenous Moloney murine leukemia virus. The level of ERV sequences in various tissues was generally lower in hematopoietic tissues such as spleen, bone marrow, thymus and lymph node, as compared with that in the non-hematopoietic tissues such as brain, skin and muscle. Conversely, the level of ERV sequences in those tissues, which can generate virus particles, such as testis, uterus and ovary, was generally higher. The disparity between the levels of ERV sequence and ERV-related RNA in tissues was particularly striking in some cases, e.g. in testis, where the ERV-related sequence and the messenger RNA level were similar. These results suggest that the endogenous retrovirus sequences
