Watch latest Hindi films online on Red Mud.Q: How can I predict when will my English-born nephew be going to America? I'm an English woman who has lived in Canada all my life. Last year, I was getting married in England so my nephew (who is 3) and my nieces (who are 20 & 17) couldn't come over to Canada. My nephew is actually the son of my sister's daughter so he is more like the brother that I didn't get a chance to have. After the wedding was over and a whole bunch of catching up was done, I found out that he wants to move to America and be a pilot. He is a very nice, intelligent, thoughtful and kind person. He also has a younger brother who works with him in the same company who also would love to move to America and be a pilot. I'm worried about how I can predict when will he and his brother move to America. I will be leaving for a visit in 10 days and I wanted to bring them both to Canada so that I can show them that Canada is not just a copy of the U.S. So how can I predict what's going to happen in the next 5 years for my nephew and his brother? A: The answer is probably, you can't. According to this source, it's not possible to get a sense of the US' immigration policy for a given year. The American government releases data on its immigration statistics on a quarterly basis. This data, however, is only published once a year. The quarterly reports are made available for three years: the most recent year available, the quarter of the most recent year available, and the quarter of the preceding year available.
