By Peter Chapman In the autumn of 2001, students from the Department of Social Psychology at the University of Sussex, England, started a project at the Institute of Psychiatry at the Maudsley Hospital in London, England, to study the behavioural effects of childhood sexual abuse. Its aim was to examine in depth what happens to people who report having been abused by their carers in childhood. The study was carried out over three and a half years and resulted in publication of two books (Patterson et al., 2008, and Fosse et al., 2007) plus a series of research papers. I met the research team in September 2004. At that point, most of the papers were being written. The first-ever book, The Anatomy of Evil, written by Patterson and her colleagues was to be published by Bantam Press in October 2005, and had not yet been completed. What interested me was their more recent research project. The authors had gathered together a group of people in which the majority, but not all, had been sexually abused as children. The key question that this project was designed to answer was "Do such persons, once diagnosed as a sexual abuse victim, really do display the full panoply of the behaviours that we have come to recognise as characteristic of paedophiles and child abusers?" The author's first paper described in some detail interviews they had undertaken with several such abuse victims. This was followed by a series of thematic reports on how these victims actually behave in everyday situations, such as meeting new people, eating, etc. The book concludes with brief biographical sketches of each of the 20 people in the study. The authors discuss the reaction of these young men and women to these interviews in the book's conclusion. The book, as I found, is extremely well written, and I would recommend it to anyone with an interest in either the effect of childhood sexual abuse on future development, or the interpersonal development of those who are sexually abused as children. Two other books I found particularly inspiring are 'The Development of Sex Offending in Child Molesters', by Patterson and Levenson (1990, 2000), and 'The Development of Adult Antisociality in Sexually Abused Children', by Patterson and De Vries (2007). The research that stimulated this book was conducted within the Maudsley Ambulance Service. They saw acute young adults for whom

Kagan's Rulings Have All the Hard Evidence Missing SCOTUSblog offers a look at the Supreme Court's decision this morning in Nieves v. Bartlett (on reporters' questions for witnesses) and Muniz v. Smith (on whether the Article III court had to conduct a hearing on child custody). For those who don't know, Professor Robert Post from USC wrote an article (in Internet Law) last year arguing that Kagan, who has never been a judge, would probably decide in favor of the reporter's privilege. The majority opinion in Nieves gives the reason why in footnote 6: Counsel's argument is based on a reading of the Sixth Amendment that elevates the right to counsel to a right to meaningful adversarial testing and the corollary that trial judges are constitutionally incompetent unless they take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the facts and arguments presented in support of criminal convictions. This reading, however, is implausible. It does not make sense to say that the judiciary is essentially useless unless it includes trial judges who will take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the factual basis of a criminal conviction. It makes no sense to say that the judiciary is an ineffective instrument of law unless it includes appellate judges who will take steps that will foster a thorough, adversarial testing of the reliability of the evidence and legal arguments used to support criminal convictions. Perhaps it is true that as of 2002, when the Sixth Amendment was adopted, state court judges were less than satisfied with the adversarial nature of their proceedings, but it makes no sense to say that the Sixth Amendment forbids state courts from creating procedures that will ensure an adversarial relationship for their proceedings. And in the Muniz concurrence, Justice Kagan's dissent, joined by Chief Justice Roberts, says: Alors que le nouveau gouvernement a publiquement reconnu le contenu de l'arrêté préfectoral qui interdit la consommation du sucre avant 16h sur tous les territoires, la mairie de Montpellier a annulé ce geste. C'est Le Président qui va annuler l'arrêté. La mairie de Montpellier va annuler cette sanction, explique le maire de Montpellier, @BertrandDeveaux. pic.twitter.com/
