This study assessed the effect of the following anesthetics and nonanesthetic vasoconstrictors on the blood flow distribution in the brain: pentobarbital, fentanyl, enflurane, halothane, nitrous oxide (N2O), methoxyflurane, sulfur hexafluoride, and nitrous oxide (N2O). The effect was assessed in a group of 12 dogs which were sacrificed after the administration of the agents in combination with i.v. methylene blue. In the group of animals receiving nitrous oxide alone, in addition to an ischemic effect on brain territories supplied by the middle cerebral artery, there was a redistribution of the blood flow towards the cerebellum, which did not occur in the animals receiving halothane, enflurane, or pentobarbital. Fentanyl, however, did not produce redistribution. The two other groups of animals receiving methoxyflurane or N2O had a redistribution of the blood flow towards the cerebellum, and ischemia of the cortical areas supplied by the middle cerebral artery. These results show that ischemic redistribution of the blood flow occurs with the administration of methoxyflurane and nitrous oxide.Heavy oil recovery operations in the Western

Canadian Sedimentary Basin (WCSB) frequently encounter a non-condensable gas component in in situ heavy oil reservoirs. Non-condensable gas produced in situ can be associated with oil production and represents an unknown but potentially large quantity of free hydrocarbon gas, which can potentially inhibit oil recovery by capillary trapping of the gas. The trapped gas is an economic loss to the operator because it must be vented during the recovery process, and an environmental loss, as the free non-condensable gas becomes oxidized and ultimately emitted to the atmosphere. There is an economic incentive to determine the physical and fluid characteristics of the non-condensable gas to enable its capture d0c515b9f4
